USPA NEWS - The King of Spain, Philip VI, presided over the delivery of the Princess of Asturias 2015 Awards and highlighted the contribution of the winners to universal values. The Monarch warned against those who rise up emotional walls because, he said, impoverish the people.

"Nobody build retaining walls with feelings. The divisions will never make a great people; only impoverish and isolate it," said King Philip VI in his closing speech at the gala awards ceremony. "We are overwhelmingly those who want a world in which the dignified life for all, and solidarity are the norm, and follow the example of those who, like our award-winning, speak out with courage and responsibility to protect the weakest, the disadvantaged, the most vulnerable," said the monarch.

He added that "we are increasingly those who aspire to the pursuit of knowledge, the passion to discover, create or imagine, and the drive to excel are real engines of progress and civilization; always in a spirit of harmony among cultures and harmony with our planet." The King concluded his remarks advocating continue "building Spain, convinced and very aware that a European nation with ancient roots and universal vocation, like ours, will remain attached on their way to a future of greater harmony and progress, with dignity, respect and pride that deserves its history and memory."

The King of Spain warned that "when emotional walls rise - or are promoted deep divisions - something is broken in ourselves, in our own being, in our hearts. Let no build walls with feelings. The divisions will never make a big people; it only impoverish and isolate. Avoid social fractures that cause so much damage to the consciences of people, affection, friendship and family, relations between citizens," he said.

"Reflect, and we value sincerity and honesty with which the Spaniards have built together, unites us and strengthens us, turn away what divides us and weakens us, and let us separate, especially from anything that seeks to point out, differentiate or reject the other," added Philip VI, who emphasized that "in a democratic society like ours, the defense of the law and constitutional principles is the guarantee of the rights and freedoms of all citizens. Therefore, we must preserve Spanish this coexistence that strengthens and enriches our collective life."
